Introduction

When people switch from one health insurance plan to another, the medications they take are often covered by the new health plan. This is known as continuing coverage of maintenance medications. There may be some specific restrictions by plan and by drug, but in general the new plan could continue covering regular medications as long as that drug is working, is needed to maintain health, is covered by the contract, and switching to a similar drug would cause health disruptions. This policy discusses when continuing coverage of maintenance medications may be considered medically necessary.

Note: The Introduction section is for your general knowledge and is not to be taken as policy coverage criteria. The rest of the policy uses specific words and concepts familiar to medical professionals. It is intended for providers. A provider can be a person, such as a doctor, nurse, psychologist, or dentist. A provider also can be a place where medical care is given, like a hospital, clinic, or lab. This policy informs them about when a service may be covered.

Coverage Guidelines

Drug	Medical Necessity
Continuation of maintenance medications	Continuation of certain maintenance medications that a member has been receiving with insurance coverage from another health plan may be considered medically necessary when all of the following conditions are met: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> The member has been continuously receiving the medication and is stable on the current regimen.

Drug	Medical Necessity
	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Switching to a therapeutic alternative medication that is preferred on the member’s new formulary benefit might result in destabilization or loss of therapeutic benefit. • Continuing treatment of the medical condition for which the medication is prescribed is needed. • Coverage of the medication is not excluded in the member’s contract. Continuation of the medication will be considered not medically necessary if the member has received manufacturer supplied samples of the medication at no cost from the prescriber or used the manufacturer’s free trial coverage coupons as a means to establish the member as a current user of the medication. The prescriber should submit the standard prior authorization or step therapy request for the medication. Requests clearly meeting the above criteria will be routinely approved. Where the nature of the therapy in question does not clearly meet the above clinical criteria, the request will be reviewed on a case basis. Prescribers should supply notes describing the patient’s overall situation, including significant history, comorbidities, concomitant medications and other clinical factors that support continuing the established therapy.

Additional Information

With the increasing cost of prescription medications and concerns regarding abuse and diversion, the use of manufacturer supplied samples given to the patient by a provider is decreasing. Recently, this practice is being replaced with manufacturer coupons and other special assistance programs that either provide full coverage for a trial period of the medication or provide copay assistance to the member. While these programs have valid uses, they can be used to circumvent payer restrictions and establish a patient on therapy for which they would otherwise not qualify.

Rationale

Copay Coupons Are a Marketing Tool

Pharmaceutical manufacturers' attempts to circumvent the restrictions on access that managed care and pharmacy benefit managers present for their drugs has resulted in a widely used marketing tool: the copay card or coupon. These tools reimburse patients who have prescription-drug coverage for the cost of their copay if they choose the higher-priced brand drug instead of that preferred by their plan sponsor.

At one time, a drug's commercial success or failure was largely driven by how well it was received by physicians. Pharma marketers primarily targeted physicians. But then drug makers found that aggressive direct-to-consumer campaigns could more effectively influence prescription-writing, and their focus shifted to patients. But starting in the late 1990s, another transition began. Today, the commercial success of a drug is largely driven by access to patients, and controlling that access are entities such as managed-care plans and PBMs. Pharmaceutical marketers have sought to regain that control by using the coupons to neutralize the financial incentives that plans use to encourage the use of clinically equivalent but lower-priced medications, chiefly generics.

How Copay Coupons Contribute to Pharmacy Waste

Copay coupons inject waste into the healthcare system. In 2011, the Pharmaceutical Care Management Association estimated that copay coupons will increase 10-year prescription-drug costs by $32 billion if current trends continue. Many patients don't consider the extra cost to the system when offered a chance to reduce their copay, and that this temporary savings may ultimately contribute to higher premiums or fewer benefits.¹

Coupons undermine the payer’s ability to use different copay amounts to reduce drug costs. They are widely available to consumers through the Internet, television, magazines, and e-mail offers. This tactic was developed over the past decade as large pharmaceutical manufacturers lost patent protection on key branded products. By using a coupon to neutralize the copay differential, patients could stay on the brand they are familiar with.

More recently, manufacturers have introduced very high-cost new drugs where the coupon may cover hundreds or even thousands of dollars per month, though this may still be less than half the total prescription cost. In turn, manufacturers have to increase drug prices to cover the cost of the coupons, and since they normally require that the individual have health insurance that is not paying the full cost, they offer no benefit to the poor and uninsured, who not only have to pay the full price, but also shoulder the burden imposed by the price increases. This becomes a moral hazard when coverage is limited to those with insurance.² Coupons are banned in Medicare and Medicaid programs based on the federal anti-kickback statute, and are partially banned in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.
